Employers Liability.

What is the duty of an employer to his employees? Should he be compelled to make some provision for them in case of their injury in his service? We had always believed that the duty rested upon an employer to see that some provision was made for an employee injured in his service, even if the carelessness and negligence of the employee contributed to the injury and an argument we recently read has convinced us more firmly of the soundness of this principle.

We do not remember by whom this argument was advanced but it was about as follows: Every manufacturer makes allowance in the conduct of his business for the wearing out of his machinery, for its depreciation by usage, figures a certain per cent. of expense for loss by damage to the machinery. People are necessary for the operation of the machinery. The business can not be conducted without some one to run the machinery. If business charge as a part of the cost of production of the articles they sell the damage to the machinery by accidents and by wearing out from usage, why not charge for the human beings who wear out in running the machinery or are injured in operating the machinery? One is as legitimate a part of the cost of production as the other and in the case of the workmen there is the added reason that common humanity should demand it. It is only fair and just.

You will say that it is not right that when a man employs another to work for him, pays him an agreed sum for that labor, that he should be compelled to do anything more; that if the workman is injured by his own negligence he must suffer. Every man, who conducts a business where machinery is used, knows that the machinery would not wear out as soon as it does if it was always given the best of care and never abused, still he makes allowance for accidents and for the wear and tear due to this abuse. His customers pay for it and the machinery must be repaired when damaged and replaced when worn out. We can see no reason why the human part of the operation of the business should not receive at least as much consideration as the inanimate nor can we see why it should not be made a permanent item in the cost of operation of the business.

We do not think that a man, and those dependent upon him, should when injured in the service of another become charges upon the public. To us it seems only fair that the man in whose service he was injured should be required to see to it that he does not suffer; that employers should be required to insure their human machines just as they insure the other machinery.

An Employers Liability Act was passed by the recent legislature and we believe that it will work both to the benefit of the employer and employee and after it has been tried a short time all will see that it is a good law.

The man who is short on knowledge is nearly always long on talk.

Our reputations are the result of the things people know about us but don't tell.

If we worked as hard as we try to make not only others but ourselves believe, we would get a great deal more done.

There's one good thing about an airship that can't be said of the automobile. If the old thing goes wrong you don't have to get out and crawl under it.—Fayette Advertiser. You are right. The occupants will already be under it and unable to crawl.

Frequently just as the editor is leaving the magnificent mansion in which he resides on the outskirts of the village, to be exact on S. High street, he will be passed by a man riding in a buggy or automobile which has a vacant seat. These people often drive past him without extending an invitation for him to ride. He desires to announce that he is always glad to ride and appreciates a lift especially at noon and on a hot day. He also would call attention to the fact that he does not think the extra weight will hurt a horse or an auto and that the only reason he does not ask to ride is that he is very diffident and retiring.
